THE OFFICIAL BLOG: PUBLICATION GUIDELINES

updated FEBRUARY 2018

OH HEY THERE!

So glad you decided to visit our Official Blog Publication Guidelines for our editorial content. There are three reasons you might be reading this document: you want some guidance on how to write for our blog, you were told to read it, or you clicked it by accident. Whatever the reason is, we're glad you're here and we hope this will be useful to you!

These Guidelines will help break down:

- 3 our vision for our content as a whole and purpose for these guidelines
- 4 our voice and tone for what we publish: to help you communicate in line with who we are
- 7 types of articles and content that we publish
- 8 expectations in writing for us and during the editing process

VISION & PURPOSE

vision

Our vision as the Power to Change Students Official Blog is to be a familiar, trusted voice for students who wish to engage with topics and ideas relating to meaning, purpose, spirituality, and everyday life. Our purpose for the blog is to produce relevant, challenging, and interesting content that gives students an opportunity to engage with spiritual ideas and grow in their faith journey. We also want to work with writers to help them develop and grow in their craft, and provide a platform to engage others with their content.

purpose of these guidelines

The purpose of these publication guidelines is to help you structure your submissions to fit with the purpose and vision of our website. We invite creativity and a variety of writing styles, but want to give you a basic example of what we most often publish.

VOICE & TONE

Our voice is essentially our personality as The Official Blog. While each writer will have their own distinct voice and tone, there will be a few personality traits that will be common throughout all of our content. This section will explain the personality traits we are adopting as a writing team.

humble

We don't have all the answers. We aren't the best ministry in the world. We might be wrong sometimes. That's just reality, and we need to write with an awareness of that reality. That doesn't mean we lack confidence or don't stand firm in truth. It means we don't present ourselves as the snooty know-it-all in class who has an answer to every question.

Inherent in being humble is the mindset that we can learn from everybody, there's always room to grow, sometimes we get it wrong, and we never look down on others when they fail or get things wrong.

authentic

If we aren't writing authentically from our experiences, we won't connect with people. Our writing must be vulnerable, open, and real. There is nothing we should feel shame in addressing. Showing our imperfections in our writing will help us connect with more people, and win the trust of those that will relate to our articles. For example, when you are sharing about biblical principles you've learned, tie it to a personal story to make it more human and relatable.

courageous

We want to promote courage, bravery, stepping out of comfort zones, and breaking barriers. Our content should challenge and encourage students and compel them to action. If we want students to do things that scare them and step out of their comfort zone, our writing should reflect that as well. We used to solve this by having an explicit “Your Turn” section at the end of the article where we called students to action. We still want that, but try and integrate those action points into the actual article when possible.

knowledgeable

If you do not have knowledge on a subject, make sure it is well researched/fact checked before you write/submit the article. If we want to be trusted, we have to at least look like we know what we’re talking about. If someone else could speak on a topic better than you can, interview them and use their voice in the piece. Writers should aim to be experts on what they’re talking about, but they can only know so much. Don’t be afraid to talk to people smarter than you.

Pro-Tip: Anytime you are quoting someone, a statistic, or any externally verifiable piece of information, ask someone to fact check for you. Even better, cite your sources when it’s appropriate to do so.

At P2C - Students we have a history of jargon, abbreviations, and funny language. We must be conscious of the words we use. If the word or acronym wouldn’t make sense to the average non-christian, don’t use it. If you use P2C terms, explain them. For example: “This year at Plus our KSL told her DG members that someone PRC’d in DR! PTL!” is exactly what we are trying to avoid. If reading that sentence you don’t even know what it’s talking about - it’s even better.

empathetic

Try to empathize with the reader. Get into the mind of a student who just can't believe in God if you're writing something apologetic, for example. Make a point in your article to show that you understand the people who disagree with you. It is easy to straw-man arguments you're speaking against. Don't minimize the feelings of a potential reader.

Have fun with prose. Make jokes and bad puns (as long as they are self aware) If the article is fun to read, more people will read it. If your own article is boring you, think of ways to spice it up. We're communicating with students and students want fun. There's a time to be serious, but our content often leans that way naturally. Be conscious of the tone of your last few pieces. If they've all been super serious and deep, think of something a little light hearted for your next piece. Fun is not wrong, and it's not antithetical to Christian content (believe it or not).

timely

We have traditionally heavily favoured Evergreen content, which are articles that can be published and promoted at any given time because they aren't related to any specific current event. While evergreen content is important and necessary, we will grow to include more timely and relevant content in our publication cycles. We should be talking about what students are talking about. Read the news, stay current, and allow your cultural connectedness to begin influencing your writing and the topics you decide to address. If a hashtag is trending globally, talk about it.

gospel centred

Last but not least (possibly most), our stuff needs to be gospel centred. Every article should reflect gospel truths in some way. We don't need to communicate the gospel completely in every article, but they should always point to Jesus and reflect his love.

ARTICLES & CONTENT

On the Official Blog we post a variety of article styles and content. There is creative freedom in pitching ideas and thinking outside the box - we welcome it gladly! However if you're looking for some examples of work that we typically publish it would include:

a. norm-form

Normal articles are between 650 and 1000 words and are often editorial in their content. That means they can be based on your experience or your opinion (as long as it's not presented as fact). They have a short introduction or a "hook" and each point is summarized as a bold header. The flow of thought is concise and clear, with a strong conclusion including natural takeaways or action steps for the reader.

b. journalism

Journalistic articles seek to tell a compelling story about an event, an issue in culture/society, or something ministry related. They should include direct quotes to convey your points, and researched facts to support the story if necessary. These stories should not be slanted by the writer's' opinion.

c. reviews

Book or movie reviews are helpful to convey Christian or spiritual themes in the context of our culture. Books, movies, video games, podcasts, plays... It's all fair game for reviewing! The aim is for the reader to think deeply about the content they consume and consider a potentially new perspective.

d. creative expression

This is where "out-of-the-box" thinking gets fun. This could be publishing a photo essay, heavy on photography with captions that emphasize a story you seek to tell. Or using a drawing or cartoon to express humor, irony, or satire to the reader, inviting them to think deeper on a topic.

EXPECTATIONS

When you submit an article pitch through our submission form or apply to write for our website, you can expect that someone on our Editorial team will be in contact with you within 2 business days with next steps.

If your pitch is approved please submit your finished article to writing@p2c.com for editing, or directly to your assigned editor if you know them already. Please submit all work as a Google Document or as a Word Document.

When your editor gives feedback on the Google Doc please reply to their suggestions within 48 hours as it helps the editing process progress in a timely manner. Please feel free to “approve” suggestions (clicking the checkmark) but never “reject” the suggestion (clicking the X). If you have an issue or disagree with the suggestion please comment on the suggestion itself to communicate with the editor.

We are excited to help create amazing content and are blessed to have people like YOU consider working with us. Thanks for being awesome.
